LOUISA'S LETTER

Dear Louisa: I am an old woman who has recently lost her husband. My husband did not make a great success during his life time and if I sell his books, etc. I suppose I can clear about one thousand dollars.

Now my problem is this. I have one son who has a wife and three children. They have a small house but I can share a room with one of the children. My daughter-in-law and I are not very congenial although we have never had any unpleasantness. Another thing is that I like peace and quiet and three small children can be very noisy.

Shall I turn what I have over to my son and let him take care of me or shall I go to a home for old people which is near where I live? This home is not entirely charitable for you have to have at least one hundred dollars and decent clothes before you can be admitted. Each person has a nice room with a tiny kitchenette and is served a nice dinner each day. There are some very nice old people there who have no families to live with. Do you think it would look odd if I go to the home rather than live with my son?

WORRIED-N. Y.

Answer: No. I do not think it would look odd and I think it would be a very sensible thing for you to do and one that would make all of you happier as things are now.

To begin with, the noise and lack of privacy in your son's house would probably cause you to be irritable and unhappy, not to mention what effect you might have on them. And if you give up the little money you have you will be in the position of having to ask for every little thing you desire.

Whereas if you go to this home

(that you speak of, you will have your own little private place to go to when you wish to get away by yourself. You can visit your son, often, carrying the children little presents and they will always be delighted to have grandmother as long as they know she is not there for good. And she will be doubly welcome as long as she has a little money in the bank.

Now this sounds very hard-hearted but unfortunately it is true in most cases.

There are instances, of course, when a mother is very congenial with her daughter-in-law and they enjoy living together. Mother helps with the children but has her own room when she wishes to be by herself. This is fine and everyone helps the other members of the family.

If "Worried" was very fond of her daughter-in-law and the house was larger she might consider living with her in-law, but I certainly shouldn't turn my little bit of cash over to anyone if I could help it.

LOUISA.

VET INSURANCE

Reinstatement of National Service Life Insurance policies by veterans are, barely keeping pace with new lapses, despite the eight-month reinstatement campaign of the Veterans Administration. Some 900,000 World War II veterans have reinstated lapsed policies, worth $5,500,000,000, since last February, according to the V.A. However, about the same number of additional veterans have allowed similar policies to lapse upon discharge from the armed services. The result is that there still are between 9,000,000 and 10,000,000 lapsed policies, totaling $100,000,000,000.
